I. Background

On 05th April 2012, The Victims Support Section (VSS) of the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC) in cooperation with Transcultural Psychosocial Organization (TPO) and Cambodian Defenders Project (CDP) organized the Workshop on "The Baseline Study on Gender Sensitivity in Transitional Justice Process in Cambodia" at Imperial Garden Villa and Hotel. During the workshop it has 36 participants from different NGOs and Civil Society Groups.

1. Objective

The aim of the workshop is to present findings from a Baseline Study on gender sensitivity of transitional justice work in the context of the Khmer Rouge Tribunal. By presenting and discussing the findings we hope to initiate a discussion on gender-sensitive practices in the field of transitional justice, conflict transformation and gender-based violence. As part of this project two external consultants (Dr. Theresa de Langis, Senior Specialist in Women's Human Rights in Conflict Settings and Ms. Noy Sophary, Cambodian Specialist) conducted a baseline study to measure the gender sensitivity of NGOs working in Transitional Justice. They will be presenting the results from this research and discussing strategic actions for moving forward.

This workshop will also be used to launch the Gender Thematic Workshops which will commence in May. These workshops are targeted at NGOs working in Gender and NGOs working in Transitional Justice. Each workshop will explore best practice in incorporating a gender perspective into specific activities and approaches used by NGOs. During the workshop on Thursday we will discuss the activities/approaches that the Gender Thematic Workshops should focus on.

2. Purpose

The purpose of the NGOs Baseline Study aims to assess current gender competence and sensitivity of NGOs involved in transitional justice efforts in Cambodia. Using at scale of 0-5, a set of core indicators has been developed; selected samples were asked and ranked the implementation of activities against each indicator. Please detail in Annex 3.

3. Pre-Workshop Survey:

Before workshop starts, the participants were asked to fill on the evaluation. Please refer to the detail findings are listed in Annex 2.

II. Workshop:

1. Opening

Mr. IM Sophea, Outreach Coordinator, a representative of Mr. RONG Chhorng, Chief of the Victims Support Section, welcomed the participants, explained the background of project, outline of the study. He thanked everyone who come to attend the workshop, like Cambodian Center for Human Rights (CCHR), Legal Support for Children and Women (LSCW), Legal Aid for Cambodia (LAC), United Nations,

3. Baseline Survey's Findings

The results of baseline survey were presented by Dr. Theresa de Langis, Senior Specialist in Women's Human Rights in Conflict Settings, and Ms. Noy Sophary, Cambodian Specialist, on "Gender Sensitivity in Transition Justice Processes in Cambodia".

Dr. Theresa de Langis, Senior Specialist in Women's Human Rights in Conflict Settings

(1) There is need to increase awareness on "gender" inside the institution:

It appears that many NGOs have wrong perception on their roles in promoting women's right by not having adopted gender responsive approach. For instance, a human right NGO would not have gender-project because it is viewed that including gender project in their institution would make them operate outside their institution's mandate. With this misperception, not many NGOs have included reference to gender, nor clearly articulate how gender equality will be promoted and achieved in their project outcomes. Many organizations recognize the need for emphasis on crime against women in their institutions but not mentioning in written documents or policies. There is still lack of research or in-depth analysis on how to make use of existing international legal frameworks and standards regarding gender discrimination and sexual violence in conflict that are referred in other internationalized tribunals (such as ICTR, ICTY, SCSL, ICC,) as well as the Convention on Elimination Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) notwithstanding their specific relevance to the promotion of gender equality and women's empowerment.

(2) Chances to make explicit and deliberate strategic approach to gender equality more visible:

Having a clear strategic approach to gender equality is very essential for many NGOs to be a more gender- responsive but it is barely visible in practice.

Only a few NGOs that have developed a database system to record the participation of victims, especially women—the beneficiaries of their projects which are often known as "civil parties or complainants"; this practice have been useful but improvements are strongly needed. There is general acceptance that there is no full system in place to disaggregate sex data. With the absence of systematic sex disaggregation and analysis, it appears that specific risks that women face have not been addressed properly, and this could leave women in a greater risk and hence discourage them from participating.

The lack of human resources who have expertise on gender and can design gender-oriented activities in transitional justice, and limited capacity building for staff to work have remained the barrier for the NGOs to explicitly develop gender responsive programs. However, advanced gender competent staff members do exist in a few NGOs, although in very small numbers, thereby increasing the chances of influencing policy and organizational culture. The fact that there is successful story to be shared among NGOs has created greater chance for NGOs to develop strategic approach to gender equality.

(3) Need to address the issues of retaliation, backlash, ostracism (2, 4, 10, 11)

The lack of participation of women in decision-making about policy, planning, budgeting and programming have made the NGOs unable to fully assess the potential risks on women. In addition, the lack of explicit approach to gender equality by many NGOs have resulted in less attention given to women participation in the transitional justice process, especially in the ECCC's legal proceedings as complainants in general and as civil parties in particular. Although many women participating in the ECCC process have been provided supports by various NGOs, the difficulties for women to freely express their views or telling their stories at the public spaces continue to be a big challenge facing them given their special needs such as childcare, safe environment, (communication) language problem. Some NGOs have developed and provided protective measures to their targeted groups especially women participants who often attended in various meetings, workshops and public forums. However, those measures are not sufficient to prevent retaliation or backlash, or ostracism from their village fellows or even their family members.

(4) Fostering Coordination and peer learning (sharing best practice )

A number of NGOs have articulately adopted gender responsive approach into their practice. There is a good reason for other NGOs to learn these best practices from their peers with the establishment of possible means in order to achieve greater outcomes. In addition, there is also a need for coordination and expansion of services delivery because it appears that almost all NGOs have relied too heavily on the services or expertise of one or two NGOs (TPO, CDP) in regard to psychological supports when victims participation come into play.

Please see detail report in Annex 3.

4. Questions and Answers

After presentation of the consultants, the participants were facilitated for questions and answers, in which the floors have been filled with questions from the decision on sample selection to methodology and scaling of the content findings. The participants also paid attention in listening to the consultants explanation of the international setting principle for such gender related policies incorporated in workplace and other international setting and institution.

5. Recommendation from Participants and the Consultants:

- a) Continue awareness raising on gender—particularly gender in the transitional justice context—that would result better understanding and avoid misperception that can minimize the efforts of the institutions to address gender issues within their institution's mandate or project outcomes.
- b) Develop a system that can collect and analyze properly and adequately sex disaggregation; this would allow better achievement and great outcomes in relations to women empowerment and gender equality, thereby making meaningful gender-sensitive programs
- c) Create projects or incorporate in the project activities with a gender responsive approach that would result in greater women empowerment impacts.
- d) Expand the psychological support services, instead of depending solely on TPO/CDP to deal with the high number of civil parties participating in the ECCC, particularly women who have special needs for their participation prior, during and after the hearings;
- e) Where having SGBV expert is not possible due to funding constraints, etc., consider the
  - option to have training of trainers or some sort of mandatory staff training or peer learning on gender sensitive approaches through outside experts, so that the project staff are more prepared with "do no harm" approach.
- f) Develop or incorporate the approach of "Do no harm" in the projects, especially towards women participating in the transitional justice process

- specific provisions on "gender equality or equal gender representation" at the both the levels of decision making and the project's services delivery. This internal rule should also include provisions on sexual harassment prevention and complaint mechanisms in place where violations are not tolerated and remedies are adequately provided.
- h) Consider formalizing cooperation among NGOs especially sharing resources (such as conflict mapping) and knowledge on best practices relating to gender-sensitivity and women empowerment.

6. Post-Workshop Survey

After the workshop, the participants were requested to fill in the form of Post Workshop Survey in order to find out how the participants have enriched their knowledge in GBV related principle in the workplace and also part of the future policy streaming on gender related policies at workplace. Please result in Annex 4.

III. Closing

The closing remarks made by Mr. DOUNG Savorn, Program of GBV of CDP. He thanks all staff who come from different sections and specially staff from UN Women for comments, suggestions and recommendation in this Workshop. The final report will be sent to all participants by email.

NGOs Baseline Study Results on Gender-Sensitivity in Transitional Justice Processes in Cambodia

A Project on "Promoting Gender Equality and Improving Access to Justice for Female Survivors and Victims of Gender-Based Violence under the Khmer Rouge Regime"

By Sophary Noy, National Consultant

May 2012 Phnom Penh, Cambodia

Acknowledgement

I would like to sincerely thank the participants of this research for their time and contribution both in giving interviews and providing feedbacks during the workshop on the preliminary finding presentation. They have shared their challenges and best practices in achieving gender-responsive outcomes, which allowed me to identify the barriers in carrying out gender-sensitivity in operations and activities of the Civil Society Organizations (CSOs).

A big-thank you to the entire staff of the Victims Support Sections (VSS) of the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC), and especially Mrs. Kimhuch Heng for her excellent facilitation and administrative support throughout this research period. I am particularly grateful to Mr. Sophea Im, an Outreach Coordinator of the VSS/ECCC for his guideline in developing the research concept note, identifying participants for this research and facilitating the NGOs baseline workshop.

Also, thank to Mr. Savorn Duong, CDP's GBV Project Coordinator, and Ms. Judith Strasser, GIZ Senior Advisor to TPO for their inputs on developing research concepts.

I would like to express my profound gratitude to Ms. Alison Barclay, Gender Advisor to CDP, Ms. Beini Ye, GIZ Senior Advisor to CDP for their valuable comments, support and advice during the writing process for this NGOs baseline. Without them, this report would never have been this precise. Both of them have also helped editing the content of this report.

And finally, I am infinitely indebted to Dr. Theresa de Langis, a specialist and an international counterpart of this research, who had a leading role in developing the research concept note and the core indicators. Her expertise in women's human rights in post-conflict setting has equipped me to ensure the accuracy in analyzing the data.

This report is dedicated to the victims and the survivors of the Khmer Rouge regime whose fight for survival has shed light on the roles of women in the restoration of the society in the wake of mass-atrocities. Their hard work has inspired greater effort in seeking justice and promoting national reconciliation.

REPORT ON NGOs BASELINE STUDY RESULTS

BASELINE STUDY on GENDER SENSITIVITY IN TRANSITIONAL JUSTICE PROCESSES IN CAMBODIA The Victims Support Section of the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia

by Sophary Noy, national consultant

I. Introduction

Transitional Justice is a compilation of mechanisms used to achieve redress for past human rights violations. Throughout time, it has become a critical component of national and international efforts to strengthen the rule of law and improve respect for human rights in the wake of conflict, as well as an integral element of the peace-building agenda in countries recovering from protracted civil war.

In line with the United Nations' growing role in providing technical support and funding to transitional justice process, the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC) has been awarded a Project of the United Nations Trust Fund to End Violence Against Women on "Promoting Gender Equality and Improving Access to Justice for Female Survivors and Victims of Gender-Based Violence under the Khmer Rouge Regime," for 2011 to 2014. The ECCC will implement the project in cooperation with two Cambodian non-governmental organizations (NGOs), namely Cambodian Defenders Project (CDP) and Transcultural Psychosocial Organization (TPO).

The Program Goal is to promote gender equality and improve access to justice for female survivors and victims of gender-based violence (GBV) under the Khmer Rouge regime by improving gender-sensitivity in operations and activities of the ECCC, civil society organizations and educational institutions for judicial professionals, thereby contributing to preventing GBV and increasing access to justice for all survivors of GBV.

The baseline is expected to contribute to the design of a comprehensive gender-sensitive transitional justice initiative with the ECCC and the Civil Society Organizations. While a separate baseline (ECCC baseline) was conducted to measure the performance of the ECCC institution in relation to gender-responsiveness, this baseline study (NGOs baseline) is also used to measure the extent to which gender is mainstreamed in affiliated NGOs as an indicator of gender sensitivity related to transitional justice issues, especially concerning GBV responses. Overall, therefore, the extent of gender mainstreaming serves as the controlling indicator for the baseline, with gender mainstreaming approaches defined as such: "Gender mainstreaming entails that women's as well as men's concerns and experiences are integral to the design, implementation,

monitoring and evaluation of programs and services so

women and men

"Transformative justice seeks to address not just the consequences of violations committed during conflict but the social relationships that enabled these violations in the first place, and this includes the correction of unequal gendered power relations in society." -- RashidaManjoo, UN Special Representative for Violence Against Women, Its Causes and Consequences.

benefit equally and inequality is not perpetuated."1

Gender equality is an explicit aim of gender mainstreaming. There is a growing awareness of the central role of organizational culture in the design and delivery of gender sensitive programs and projects.<sup>2</sup> In such an institutional culture, gender is "integral to all decision and interventions including of staffing, procedures, and programs and is the part of the responsibility of all staff."<sup>3</sup> As such, the baseline aims to measure gender mainstreaming in both programmatic focus and organizational culture of the Civil Society Organizations operating in the sphere of transitional justice in Cambodia.

II. Methodology

To adequately measure impact of the project, two external consultants<sup>4</sup>were contracted to conduct a baseline study, hired by the VSS of the ECCC, in cooperation with partner organizations CDP and TPO. According to the Terms of Reference (ToR), the baseline study aims to provide a clear understanding of "past and current efforts in including women in the transitional justice process and assess the awareness toward gender issues and the need for capacity building in the ECCC as well as civil society organizations (CSOs) working in the context of the Khmer Rouge Tribunal." This assessment will be used to shape a holistic gender-sensitive transitional justice program with a focus on capacity building, psycho-social support, community truth telling and awareness raising, symbolic reparations and historical documentation that includes women.

For the purposes of this baseline, an interview questionnaire which consists of a set of core indicators for measuring gender responsive transitional justice processes has been developed to assess current gender competence and sensitivity of NGOs involved in transitional justice efforts in Cambodia.

Using a scale of 0-5, the respondents were asked to rank the implementation of each indicator based on the respondent's current knowledge and as related to their current Organization. All responses were then averaged for a composite ranking, with "5" indicating exceeds minimum standards and "1" indicating the information is missing or does not exist. A "0" indicates "I do not know" or "Not Applicable." The rating scale is included below.<sup>5</sup>

A list of key respondents for the baseline from the NGOs involved in transitional justice efforts were selected in consultation with the VSS and its project partners CDP and TPO. Fourteen (14) NGOs and Victims Associations were selected for interviews based on active engagement in fostering transitional justice initiatives by implementing a specific project related to the Khmer Rouge past. Two NGOs declined to be interviewed.

Final results are based on interviews with a total of 15 respondents representing 11 NGOs and one Victims Association. Respondents were self-identified with decision-making representatives or program managers who are responsible for program planning and implementation of the respective Khmer Rouge related program. Interviews took place in the office of each respective respondent between the weeks of 20 February and 5 March and the interviews lasted for an average duration of 45 minutes to 90 minutes. All responses are provided anonymously and treated with confidentiality.

5	Exceeds minimum standards.	The indicator exceeds "minimum standards", best practice.
4	Meets minimum standards.	The indicator is in place in a meaningful and sustainable way, in policy and practice.

III. Results of Baseline Study by Core Indicators: Gender Responsive Transitional Justice Processes in Civil Society Organizations

What follows are the results of the baseline study on gender responsive approaches to transitional justice within civil society groups. Each NGO is provided an individual ranking; individual rankings are averaged for a composite score for all NGOs. General observations about results are noted for each indicator.

Scores have been rounded to the nearest number to correspond with the rating scale. Exact numbers are provided in brackets below each score.

Psychosocial support is provided to the beneficiaries in almost every activity as reported by NGOs. However, most NGOs refer their beneficiaries to TPO as it is the only organization which provides professional counseling. TPO has an exclusive agreement with the ECCC to provide expertise and psychological support to the Court. Very often, prior to, during and after any event, TPO staff provides victims or Civil Parties with briefings on how best to manage their trauma, as well as on-site assistance. Respondents were aware that they should not rely totally on TPO because not having internal capacity is not sustainable nor systematic; however resource constraints have derailed their efforts to develop their capacity in this area. 		Additionally, a few respondents have focal points in place around Cambodia that can offer assistance to link participants with services they may need after their participation in a program. In such a case, it is important to note that not all Civil Parties will be granted the measures they asked for because it is the court (ECCC) who decides who is eligible for the service based on the strict requirements within the Internal Rules.  Follow-up monitoring is provided on a case by case basis. Additionally, as mentioned above a few NGOs have created village focal points with whom a beneficiary can consult before and after sharing their experiences to others. However, none of the respondents had a systematic approach to ensuring the ongoing protection of women participating in the Court.  The risk of social backlash and ostracism to participants needs to be addressed systematically and collaboratively across the multiple actors that work with victims of Khmer Rouge.

The respondents have attempted a number of strategies to overcome this including focusing on increasing the representation of women in specific positions that don't require travel or have less barriers for women. However, this approach can be problematic as it may prevent the organization from identifying and responding to the barriers that prevent women from gaining employment in other areas of the organization.  All of the respondents are aware of the need to increase the numbers of women in their organizations, however they have been unable to overcome the challenges and achieve this goal. ### IV. Conclusion:

(1) Gender Awareness

The vast majority of NGOs interviewed argued that gender issues are not relevant for their organization as their mandate is to work with their beneficiaries, who are both male and female. The widely held view is that only gender-focused NGOs need to be concerned with gender. This demonstrates that these NGOs are unaware of the ways that gender interacts and influences program delivery and organizational operations and that they do not understand the idea of gender mainstreaming. For example, respondents from human rights based NGOs described a focus on gender and women's rights as being in conflict with their mandate to promote and protect human rights for all people. For instance, some human rights NGOs reported that they would not have a gender-focused project because in their view focusing on gender or women specifically is outside their institution's mandate to deal with thematic issues such as civil and political rights or socio-economic rights. This is likely due to the reality that 'gender' as an issue in its own right has not been fully incorporated into human rights discourses.

Further, the interviews with the human rights based NGOs suggest that they are unaware of how gender interacts and influences all programs/projects and operations. They were also unaware of the value of being more gender sensitive in their work and were concerned about the costs of making changes to their practice. As a result many NGOs have not included any reference to gender, nor clearly articulated how gender equality will be promoted and achieved in their project outcomes, which is a necessary pre-requisite to sustainable human rights outcomes.

The Vienna Declaration and Program of Action emphasizes that the rights of women and girls are "an inalienable, integral and indivisible part of human rights", requiring special attention as part of all human rights activities. The statement further underlines the importance of "the integration and full participation of women as both agents and beneficiaries in the development process."

Similarly, none of human rights based NGOs, such as NGOs working in education and peace building, reported that gender was not a main consideration for them as they have a specific mandate with identified beneficiaries that include both men and women. They also felt that gender should be the focus of women's rights based NGOs. However, as the respondents became more aware of the issue of gender during the interviews they demonstrated a willingness to learn more.

Among respondents there is a lack of research and in-depth analysis on how to make use of existing international legal frameworks and standards regarding gender discrimination and sexual violence in conflict. Only a few of the NGOs interviewed make any reference to international tribunals such as ICTR, ICTY, SCSL, ICC, or relevant international conventions such as CEDAW which specifically addresses the promotion of gender equality and women's empowerment.

The Vienna Declaration and Program of Action was adopted by the World Conference on Human Rights in Vienna on 25 June 1993. ### (2) Strategic approach to gender equality

Having a clear strategic approach to gender equality is essential for NGOs to be a more gender-responsive but is barely visible in practice.

Of the NGOs interviewed, the vast majority had systems in place to record the number of beneficiaries involved in their programs/projects. However, only a few NGOs had developed systems that can disaggregate by sex. Sex disaggregated data is important because it provides the staff with information about how women are accessing their programs and allows them to understand the difference between men's and women's experience of their services. Thereby enabling them to modify their services to be more gender-sensitive and better meet the needs of women. The absence of systematic sex disaggregation and analysis means that NGOs do not have the information required to identify and address the specific barriers that women may face in accessing and participating meaningfully in their services. This may result in the decreased participation of women in their programs or projects.

The lack of gender expertise within the NGOs interviewed limits their ability to design gender-oriented activities in transitional justice and internally build the gender sensitivity of staff. For these NGOs this is the primary barrier to developing sustainable gender responsive programs. However, advanced gender competent staff members do exist in a few NGOs, thereby increasing the chances of incorporating gender sensitivity into policy and organizational culture. Therefore these NGOs should be acknowledged and highlighted to other NGOs for their good practice in this area as this may encourage other NGOs to develop a strategic approach to gender equality.

(3) Retaliation, backlash and ostracism

The lack of an explicit approach to gender equality by many NGOs has resulted in less attention given to women's participation in the transitional justice process, especially in the ECCC's legal proceedings as 'complainants' in general and as 'Civil Parties' in particular. Overall, there was a lack of participation of women in decision-making about policy, planning, designing, budgeting and programming in the NGOs interviewed which limits the ability of these NGOs to fully understand the potential risks of participation for women including possible backlash, retaliation and ostracism. Some NGOs have developed and provided protective measures to their targeted groups especially women participants who often attended in various meetings, workshops and public forums. However, those measures are not sufficient to prevent retaliation or backlash, or ostracism from their village fellows or even their family members.

(4) Fostering Coordination and peer learning (sharing good practice)

A number of NGOs have adopted a gender responsive approach into their practice and have high score across the indicators meaning they demonstrate good practice and experience being gender responsive. However, there is a big gap between the scores of these NGOs and the scores of some other NGOs. The NGOs on the lower side of the rating scale still have a long way to go to deliver gender responsive services. This creates an opportunity for peer learning that should be pursued. In addition, there is also a need for more coordination and expansion of service delivery because it appears that almost all NGOs have relied too heavily on the services or expertise of one or two NGOs (TPO, CDP) in regard to psychological supports for victims participating in their projects/services.

V. Recommendations:

Based on the conclusions above, the following recommendations are offered:

(1) Mainstream a gender perspective in policy and practice.

It is essential that NGOs [continue to] raise awareness among their employees of 'gender' and how it relates to the work of their organization. To achieve this, respondents could consider the following strategies:

- Develop and implement a gender mainstreaming policy and approach
- Hire a gender focal point to provide ongoing training and advice on gender sensitive practice
- Provide regular internal training on gender sensitive practice
- Support staff to participate in regular external training on gender sensitive practice.

(2) Develop a visible strategic approach to ensuring women benefit from activities/projects.

To ensure that their organization's activities/projects equally address the needs of women, respondents could consider the following strategies:

- Where possible, consult with women to identify any specific needs they may have.
- Develop a system to collect sex disaggregated data and establish processes to ensure that sex disaggregated data are collected and analyzed regularly. Participation rates and the experience of women participants should be analyzed to identify any barriers women may face in accessing, or meaningfully participating in the activities/projects.
- Implement a process of regular monitoring and evaluation to ensure that gender issues or barriers are properly identified and they can be effectively responded.
- Where necessary, create women-focused projects to respond to specific needs of women.

(3) Minimize and address the potential negative impacts of women's participation.

NGOs are obligated to ensure that participants in their programs/projects are not adversely affected by their participation ('Do no harm' approach). To ensure that the risks to participants are mitigated, the respondents may consider the following strategies:

- Increase their capacity to respond to the psychological needs of clients/Civil Parties, instead of depending solely on TPO/CDP to deal with the high number of Civil Parties participating in the ECCC, particularly women who have special needs for their participation prior, during and after the hearings. This can be done by:
  - o hiring a sexual/gender based violence expert to provide support to clients;
  - inviting an expert to provide internal training to staff on responding to the psychological needs of clients
  - o ensuring all staff are aware of the 'Do-no-harm' approach and properly apply in their work.

- Actively investigate and mitigate the risks of retaliation, backlash and ostracism that clients may face from their families or communities as a result of their participation in the programs/projects. Encourage clients to report any incidences of retaliation, backlash and ostracism and work with relevant partners including the ECCC and local authorities to address these incidences.
- Develop or incorporate 'Do no harm' approach in the projects, especially towards women participating in the transitional justice process;
- Develop internal policies or regulations that provide specific provisions on "gender equality or equal gender representation" in decision-making level and service delivery. These internal rules should also include provisions on 'sexual harassment prevention and complaint mechanisms' where violations are not tolerated and remedies are adequately provided.

(4) Foster Coordination and peer learning (share good practice)

In order to foster cooperation and peer-learning, the respondents may consider the following strategies:

- Formalize cooperation among NGOs especially sharing resources (such as conflict mapping) and knowledge on good practices relating to gender-sensitivity and women empowerment
- Investigate the feasibility of a joint conflict mapping project to document the range of violations experienced by women, the impacts of the violations and the actors involved
- Where possible, develop collaborative partnerships among NGOs working in similar areas, especially on women and gender, apart from the ECCC's context, which will give greater impact on women empowerment and gender responsiveness in the society
- Actively participate in forums or meetings for networking and sharing good practice and lessons learnt
- Document and widely disseminate the relevant research, evaluation results and examples of good practice.
